

CALIFORNIA alone has 28 state questions on the ballot. This reflects a rising national trend, according to John P. Keast of the Free Congress

The answer in every case is "the voters" — we, the people, only about half of whom, if that, bother to vote. We, not creatures from Mars, necessary to "get rid of the City Council." This suggests an unspoken elitism: I would vote right, but other voters would not. It also need to limit terms and take on ourselves the usual responsibilities of elected government?

© New York Times News Service

The Grove's The Ark must survive the pressure from developers

FROM the roadside, the two-story house at 3939 Hardie Road in Coconut Grove does not seem unique. Only when you become aware of its origins and tour its interior do you realize its historical significance and charm.

Fondly called The Ark by old-time Grove residents, the landlocked house at 3939 Hardie once was the clubhouse of the Biscayne Bay Yacht Club. Designed by Commodore Ralph Munroe, it stood, beginning in 1905, on pilings out in the bay. It was connected by a pier to Camp Biscayne, a tourist house and cottages that now is a subdivision of the same name south of Munroe's Barnacle homestead.

HOWARD KLEINBERG

SPECIAL CONTRIBUTOR

It wasn't until 1926 that The Ark went ashore and became a home just off Ingraham Highway to several generations of Grove residents. Unoccupied, it now is for sale. Many fear that someone will buy the attractive 130-by-216-foot property, tear down the house, and build anew.

"The tragedy of Coconut Grove," laments attorney Toby Muir, a former occupant of the house, "is that there is no awareness of the uniqueness of the Grove. Developer-sponsored moves have been to increase density, and every lot that has a grand old house and a beautiful garden soon will have two pink stucco houses and no garden."

The Ark is first seen as an oddly-designed residence. The bottom floor of the clubhouse contains a large central room, a small kitchen, a bathroom under the stairwell, and two porches — fore and aft, I presume, would be an apt description. The second floor, similarly, contains one large room, a bathroom, and a veranda.

The interior walls all are of diagonally placed tongue-in-groove wood, and the electric wiring all is on the outside of the interior walls, as the building originally was constructed without electricity.

According to Stuart McIver's centennial history of the yacht club, published in 1987, the clubhouse originally was 40-by-25 feet. The rear porch was added later. The large room on the bottom floor was used as a game room, and the upper floor consisted of an office, storeroom, lounge, and an open veranda, now enclosed.

By 1926, The Ark had outlived its usefulness as a clubhouse for the yacht club and was bought by contractor Bob Ervin. In his memoir, Munroe recalls that Ervin purchased the clubhouse for $1, slid the structure "bodily onto a barge, and towed it up one of the canals into the outskirts of Coral Gables, where it now sits disguised as a residence."

It actually is on a Grove subdivision once owned by pioneer J. W. Ewan.

The list of occupants is varied. One of its longest-term owners was an artist named Duman Weaver, who lived in the house from 1932 at least through 1942.

In 1958, Miami author/journalist Helen Muir purchased it from Ella Lewis for Dorothy and Milton MacKaye. Mrs. MacKaye, in addition to appearing regularly in the Ladies Home Journal, was a prominent writer of mystery novels who wrote under the name of Dorothy Cameron Disney. She is still alive, but quite ill. Milton MacKaye, now deceased, also wrote books, but as the "also" of autobiographies. He was the ghost behind the personality's name.

"Dorothy and Milton collected houses," Helen Muir recalls. "They had properties everywhere. We had become friends, and when I saw that this historic house was available, I called them in Washington. They authorized me to buy it for them sight unseen."

The MacKayes spent their winters at 3939 Hardie, but returned North in the summer to residences in Connecticut and Washington.

In 1979, Muir's son, Toby, and his wife Celeste rented the house from the MacKayes, but upon the birth of two children found it necessary to leave the one-bedroom home in 1985.

William Ross MacKaye, a former religion editor of the Washington Post and son of the MacKayes, recently wrote to Helen Muir that the family no longer could keep the property, particularly because of rising taxes. It was put up for sale several months ago, listed with Flynn Associate, Inc., of Coral Gables.

Phyllis Roth of Flynn reports that among persons interested in the house are several who expressed a desire to keep it rather than tear it down.

Good old Coconut Grove

Toby Muir, whose wife Celeste is a circuit judge, remains pessimistic as he sees existing zoning laws in the city of Miami constantly changed to meet the pressure of developers. Currently, the property at 3939 Hardie is zoned for a single residence.

In this particular case, a change to multiple dwelling might be an opportunity to save the old clubhouse, with new owners building elsewhere on the spacious lot. But with the way things are going lately vis-a-vis historic preservation and developer pressure, it more likely would be that two new houses would be built on the property.

And that would be a shame. The Ark, with its Munroe connection, is one of the most important remaining historic links to the pioneer era of the quaint Bayside fishing and sailing village called, and spelled, Coconut Grove.

...the budget of $400 billion. Not only did you risk your life for chewing tobacco, but you sacrificed everything to get a

...when are saying. Our country, right or wrong, as long as we don't have to pay for it.'"
© Los Angeles Times Syndicate

HISTORICAL MUSEUM OF SOUTHERN FLORIDA

Biscayne Bay Yacht Club, built in 1905

CANDACE BARBOT/Miami Herald Staff

... now a residence at 3939 Hardie Road

10/30/90
Miami Herald